

Synopsis

Alison Saunders will outline how the success or failure of co-operation between jurisdictions is directly related to the quality and strength of relationships between frontline prosecutors. Using examples from the Crown Prosecution Service's work with a variety of other countries, she will demonstrate that the ability to work together to bridge the gaps created by different legal systems, cultural differences and the practical difficulties that arise in these cases is critical.